We took this occasion to listen to narrations of marvellous deeds of heroism and loyalty to our cause on their part and that of their thirteen- and eleven-year old boys, who had succeeded in robbing the Boers of their dynamite, which the latter had placed in and about several culverts and railroad bridges. The little chaps, whom we of course photographed, had for some hours been watching the Boers creeping silently about preparing things to their satisfaction, and as soon as they left for a while the boys stole down at dark. Together they and their Kaffir boy, John Ramanana, stole the lot, going from bridge to culvert backwards and forwards to the farm, bringing it to their father who buried it. At dawn the Boers returned; the train passed, but there was no explosion as they had evidently expected there should be. On my arrival at Pretoria I made a full report of this to the Provost Marshal, and I hope the boys may be suitably rewarded. However this may be, I bought a good veldt pony from them to help me along the remainder of the road to Pretoria. Otherwise I doubt if we should ever have reached that long-sought-for place; for we found hundreds of oxen and horses by the roadside dead and dying, having dropped down from sheer exhaustion, utterly unable to pull through the miles and miles of deep, heavy sand. The horror of this scene is...
