Excerpt: . . . in the shape of an apprentice, who refused to leave her till his doubts should be satisfied. This was awkward, as the story could not be very well reconciled so as to suit all parties. Accordingly, when the discovery was made, which seemed to proclaim the poor girls infidelity, the youths rage and consternation were nearly equal to Lady Lakes; a circumstance that added considerable zest to the comedy. But I see it does not divert you so much as I expected, and therefore, to relieve your mind, I may tell you that the jealous varlet soon repented of his rash determination, and pursuing his mistress, whom De Gondomar had considerately taken under his protection, prevailed upon her to give the amorous ambassador the slip, and return with him to her fathers abode at Tottenham. I am right glad to hear it, said the Countess. Though I have seen so little of Gillian, I cannot help taking an interest in her; she is so pretty, and so innocent in appearance, and her manners are so artless and engaging. I owe her some reparation for the mischief I have done her, and will not neglect to make it. I am sorry I ever was induced by you to take her into my service; and I am thankful to hear she has escaped De Gondomars snares. You are wonderfully interested about her, methinks, Frances; and I hope she will be grateful for your consideration, rejoined Lord...
